Big Picture

The publishing industry has dramatically changed in the last few years with the rise of TikTok, and other book-ish sides of social media. Through recommendations, new novels are rising in mainstream popularity, and the consumerism of these stories is rising seen in the newfound popularity of the author Colleen Hoover who sold 14.3 Million books last year according to an insider. Books often end up in landfill, even though these stories can be passed down for years before fully breaking down.

Often people who are trying to get into reading turn away from classics, thinking they're a 'slog' and are too time-consuming. However, these stories often are not, reflect different time periods and beliefs, and are readily available with the lack of copyright meaning anyone can print these novels, meaning they're cheaper to buy for readers lacking the budget.

Unique Proposition

The Foxhole wants to encourage the enjoyment and consumption of classical literature, through aesthetics, making texts at a range of prices through second-hand options, and accessible printing for all. The Foxhole would offer options for those wanting to try to get into classical literature, making it more accessible to all.

Audience
The target audience of The Foxhole is broad, targeting readers and nonreaders interested in reading. The price point of these consumers and the sustainability of products is a concern, as wanting to reduce the amount of consumption of a typically consuming heavy hobby is a goal for a lot of readers, and reading, especially in New Zealand, can be incredibly expensive for someone who is reading prolifically, this is seen in the popularity of ebooks, which are cheaper, sometimes free, and require no physical production.

Objective
The Foxhole is trying to cap the accessible, good quality, and aesthetic classic novel market. The branding needs to be cohesive and encourage the audience to pursue Foxhole prints and secondhand books. The store plans on having a single location in Wellington and expanding potentially to an online storefront that would ship nationwide (New Zealand), so branding should be universal, clear, and eye-catching.

Tone
The Foxhole's visual style is reflective of more vintage branding, utilizing an aesthetic based on dark academia and its elements, patterns, and typography, to create a classic elevated aesthetic. Use of Autumnal tones, such as deep browns, oranges, and reds to create a cozy atmosphere that matches the warm and inviting focus on classic literature. As well as incorporating imagery and shape throughout the branding, reminiscent of Foxes and their natural environment. To help emphasize the business second-hand novel aspect, using design patterns of well-known covers of familiar books, such as the peacock feathers on the first hardcover edition of pride and prejudice.

Risks and Challenges
The design of The Foxhole is important for the multiple products it offers. As equal importance should be placed on secondhand novels, as The Foxhole's own edition of classics novel. Novel cover design is crucial in the enjoyment, and sales of novels, in classics especially as print and price, are typically the only two factors people consider when buying these novels.

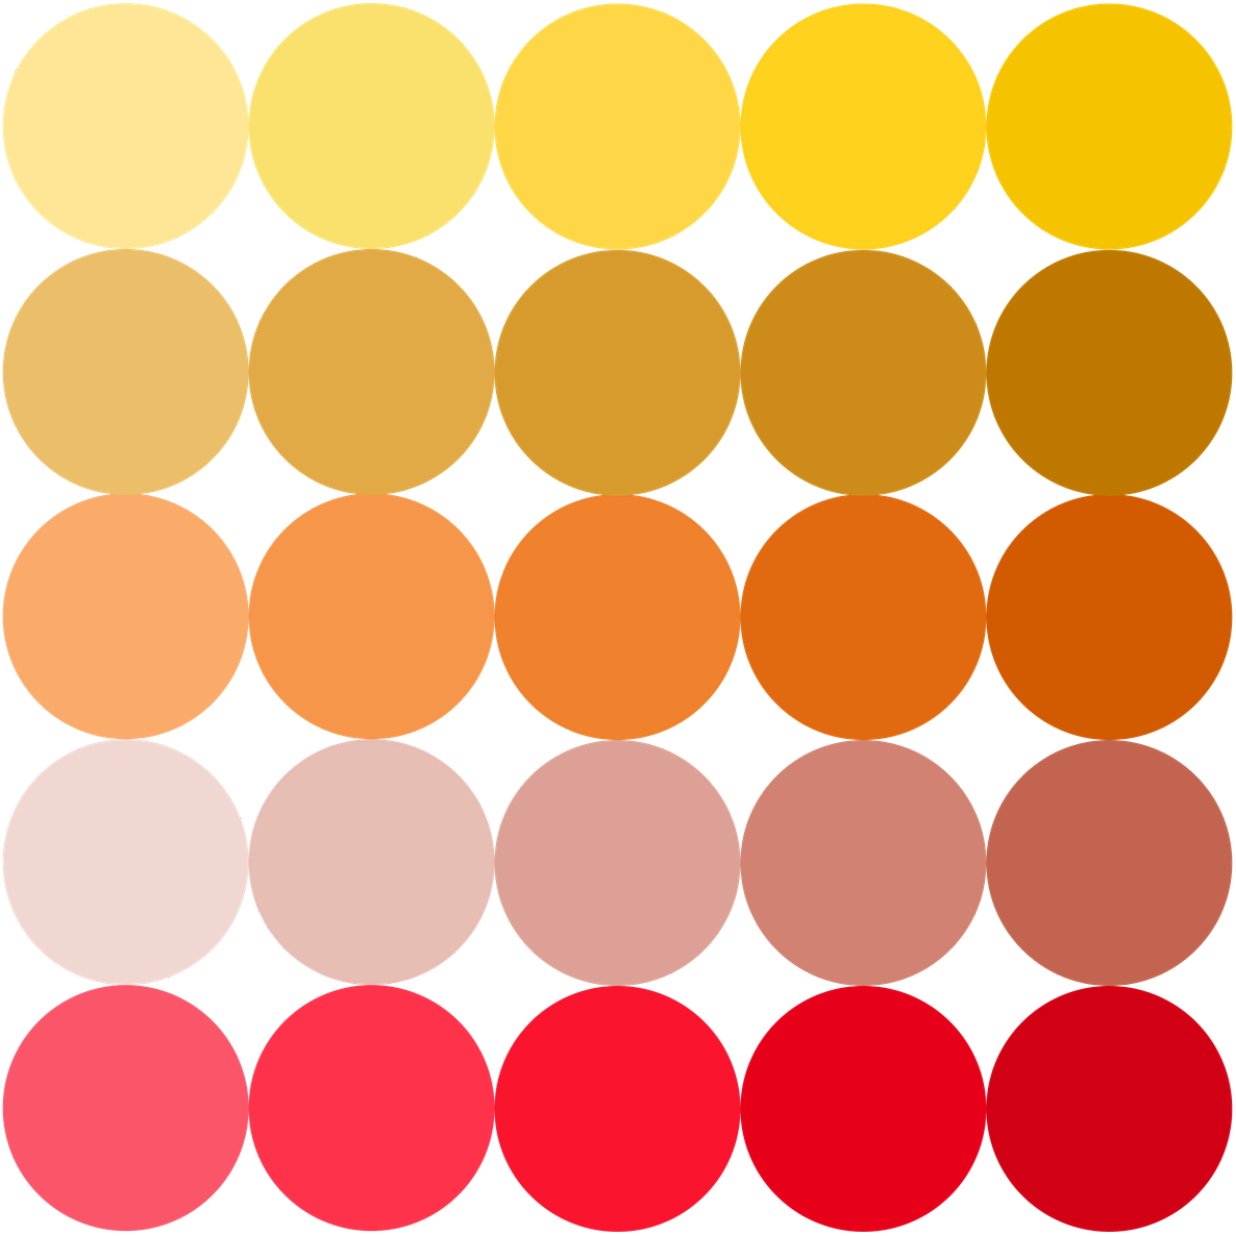

Take Away
Reading classics is for everyone, regardless of budget, and can be sustainable if we try.
