SPCA Wellington Photo Campaign

SPCA: Background

SPCA is a Not for Profit organization in New Zealand focused on Animal Welfare Advocacy, running Shelters, and providing low cost medical care.

The SPCA does many function for New Zealand communities including, welfare checks, rehoming, desexxing, microchipping, educational programming, and cruelty prevention

Yearly the organisation receives 10% of their funding from government, this covers the inspectorates who provide welfare checks for animals. Because of this they mostly run off of donations, and volunteers.

Most people know about donating money, but the SPCA also benefits largely from physical donations in the form of, toys, newspaper, blankets, towels, old appliances, pet food and more household items.

Like mentioned, most people don't know the SPCA collects donations for physical objects, and largely benefits from these.

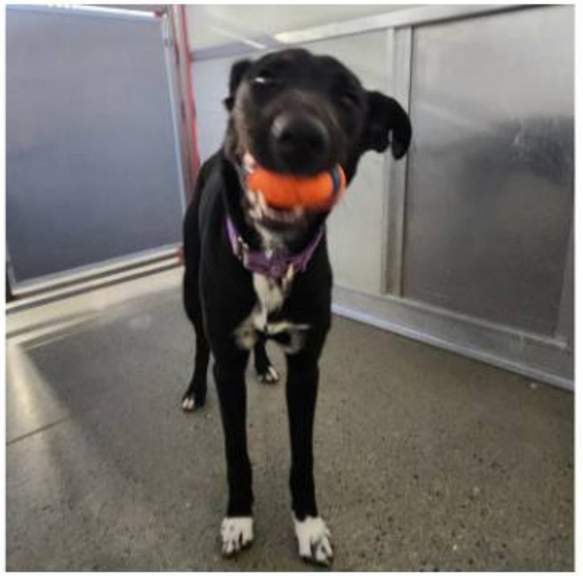

My goal for this photo campaign is to show the joy these objects bring to the animals, specifically the dogs, in the SPCA's care, and the wear and tear they get exposed to because of their value to the animals.

To do this I plan on looking at both still life photography, and animal portrait. Showing off the very loved toys, blankets, beds, and boxes the SPCA has, and their animal partner interacting with these objects the way they usually do. This is to show how love, and play, has changed these objects, as well as the positive impact donating has on these dogs.

For this project, I choose to look at four artist models, two for still-life, and two for animal portraiture.

For me to have access to take these photos, I was given permission by the Wellington Canine Team Lead, Leliltia. These photos are also being used by the SPCA for promotional content, and their respective animal's listings online.

Photographs on this slide have been taken by me, during my time volunteering at the SPCA

Amanda is a US based photographer, focusing on dog portraiture specifically. Most notably her series, ‘Dog Years’, has received viral noteriety as she photographs dogs as they age, capturing how their life spans, and aging is faster than ours.

I choose Jones, as I have seen her series ‘Dog Years’ evolve over many years, her portraits are sharp and she manages to capture the personality and details of each subject with style. I also choose her because through her series, and images, you can truly see how much dog’s mean to her. Often the first death a child experiences is the family pet, and to me her series Dog Years captures the absolute love someone has for their first dog, and every dog after.

Elias Weiss Friedman, aka The Dogist, is a New York based photographer, with an interest in street photography of dogs, he has gained noterity for his online blogs, under The Dogist name, and is also a New York Times best selling author for his two photography books, The Dogist, and The Dogist Puppies.

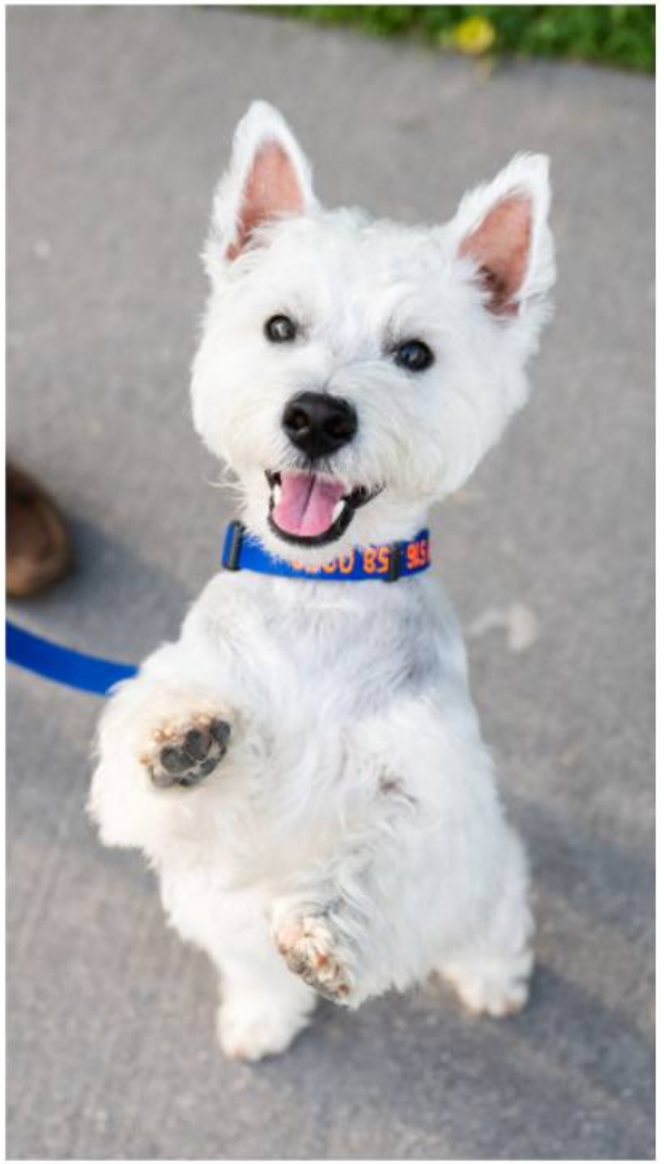

The Dogist, is another photographer I have been following for a while, his blog always contains the stories of each dog he photographs, and his resulting photos are sharp and show off each subjects personality well.

I only had one day where I was able to take photos at the SPCA with the dogs, so all photos had to be taken on day, however I decided to look back on photo's I had previously taken of dogs, to find poses, ideas, and looks, I enjoyed in my previous work.

Test Shots: Dogs

SPCA

Umi's story has been shared widely by the SPCA's team. A month ago, Umi was found cold, skinny, and with a litter of newborn puppies, alongside a rivee in a local Wellington Park.

Umi since then has gained weight, her puppies have grown, and Umi has taken up her life as a energetic single mother, and is now up for adoption.

Umi when I started to photograph her, ran straight to the office to say hi to all the staff, and recieve cuddles and treats. Umi's change in personality talking to staff has been one of the most positive changes they have seen recently, going from a dog who snarled when people got too close, to a dog who can't exist without someone to cuddle with.

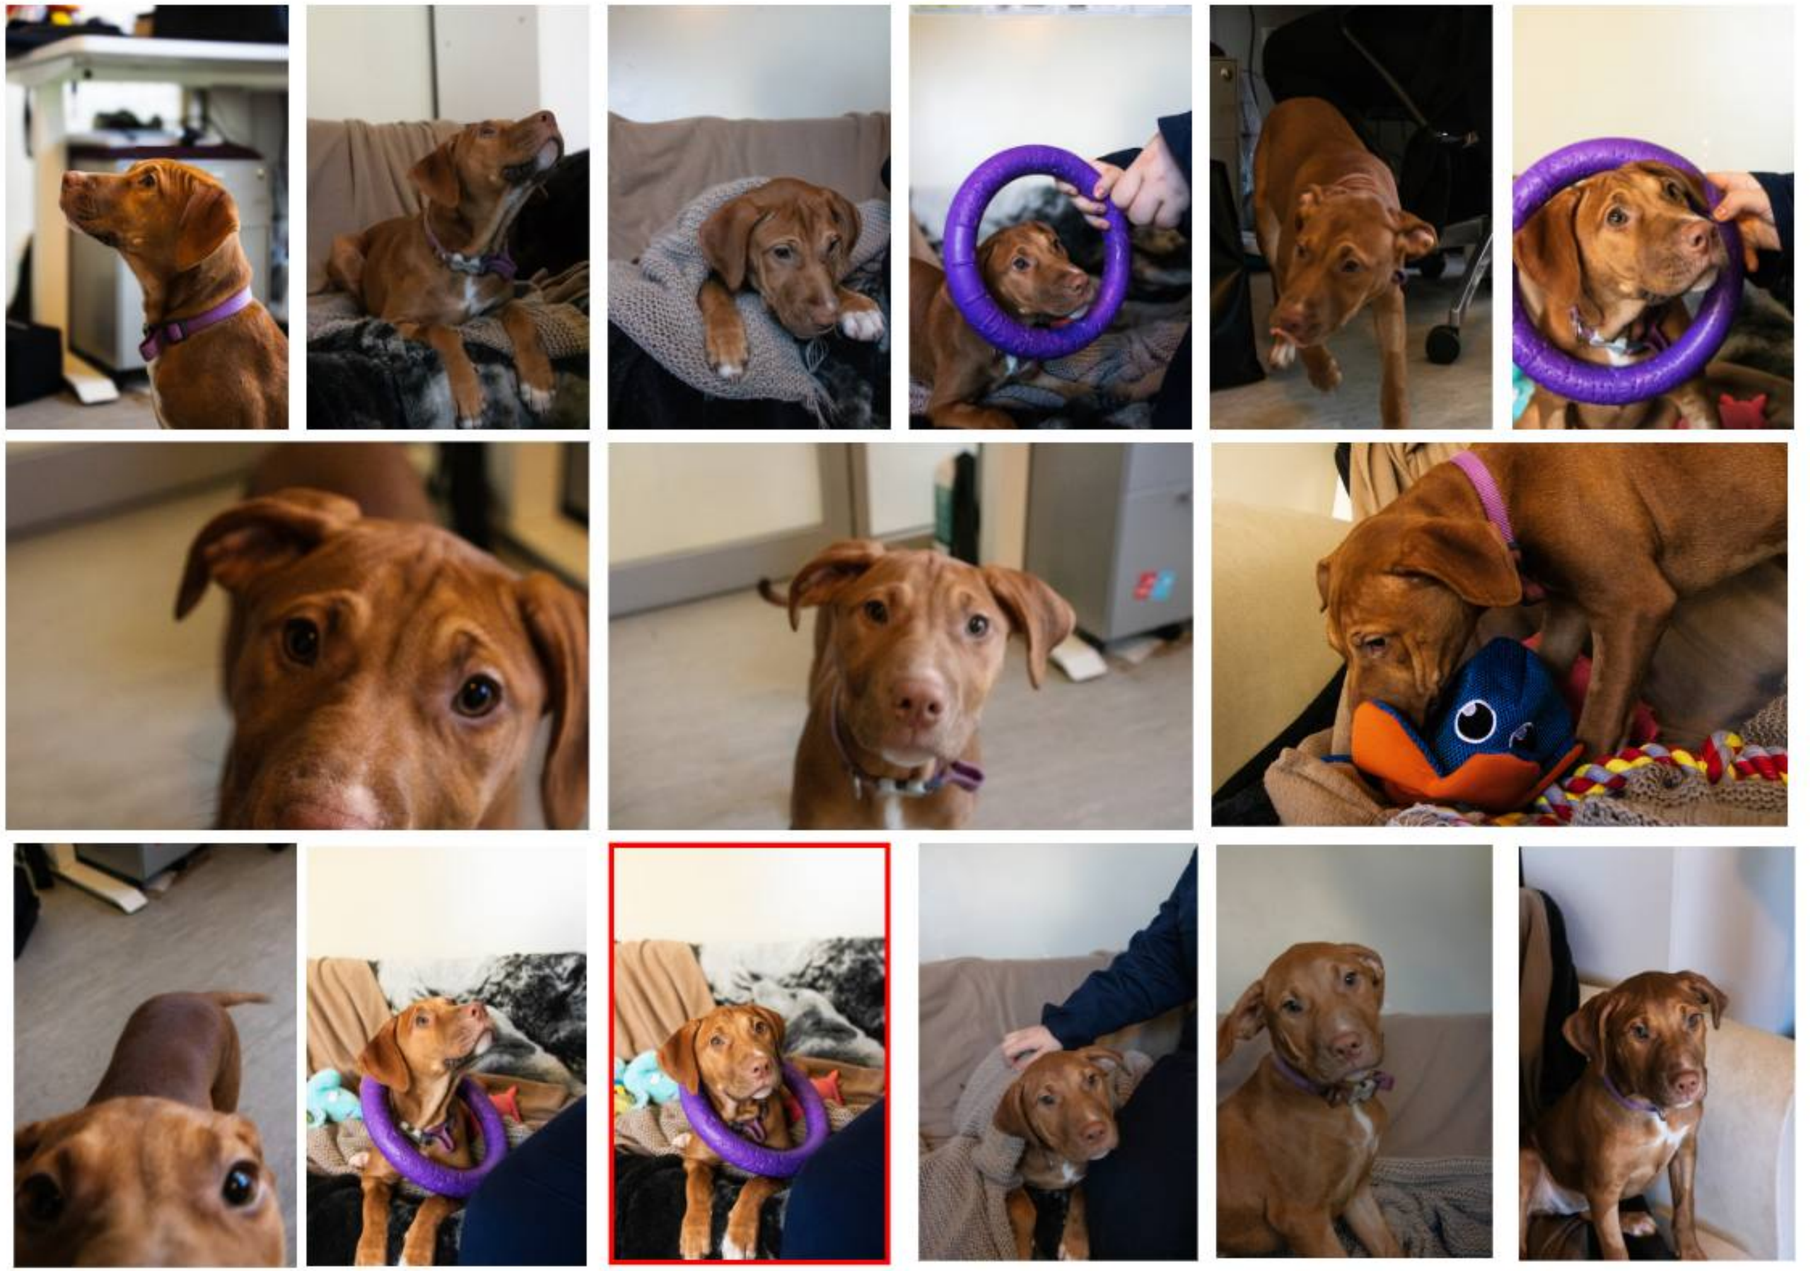

Rhubarb is the ‘choatic gremlin’ of Umi’s litter.

Rhubarb was an absolute bundle of energy, she’s goofy as can be, and caused a lot of trouble in the office, but is also the most correspondent puppy I have ever met, responding to so many commands and happy to work for treats.

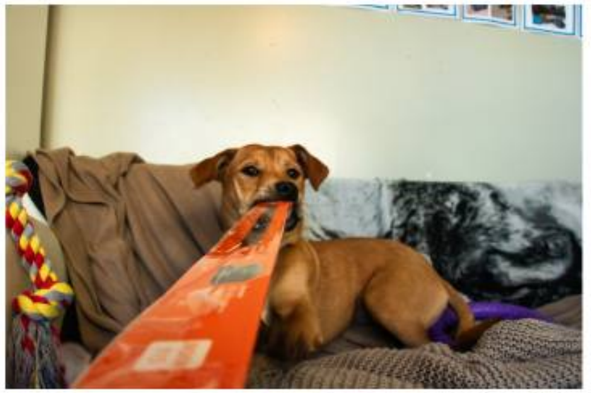

Moot was saddly a surrender to the SPCA with a leg injury, but she really hasn't let that stop her.

Moot enjoys runnng around, playing with toys and other puppies, and is such a sweet girl. Somehow her name, Moot, perfectly suits her without reason.

I found as soon as she was infront of a camera she became the perfect model, posing happily for me, with her very sassy poses.

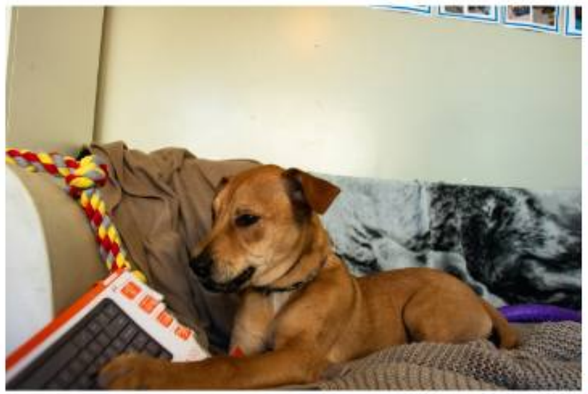

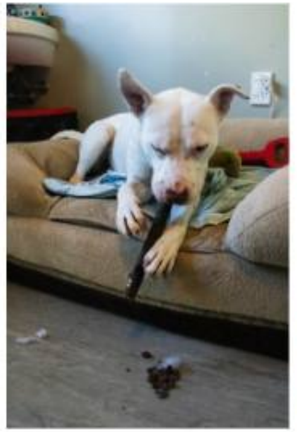

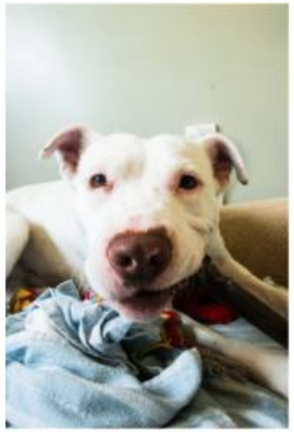

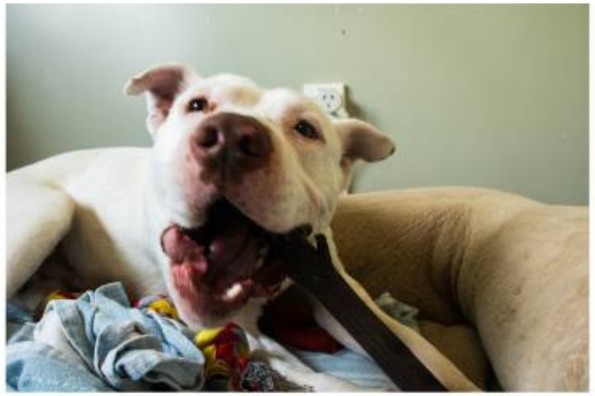

Parker too was a surrender to the SPCA.

Parker is a big boy, with a bigger heart. I can vividly remember the first time I met him, a volunteer had told me he was obsessed with tug-of-war, and I would hear him before I saw him. Walking around the kennels, I heard a bark and a thud and saw this white dog jumping up and down trying to get attention, and I knew I'd found a new favourite.

Parker is a playful boy, but also gives the biggest cuddles, and smiles, when he knows you. He is also distructive in a very polite way, creating a pile of the bits of is toy he had ripped off while I had been taking photos..

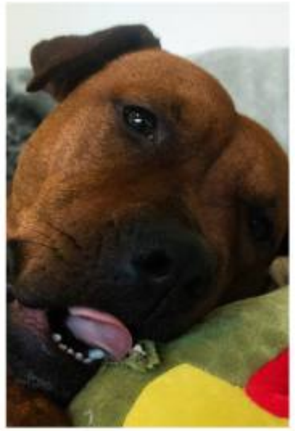

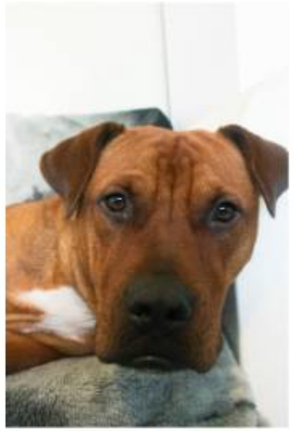

Hattie was a transfer to the Wellington SPCA from Masterton.

Once she'd arrived, she had to have her left hind leg amputated. However that hasn't stopped her, the first time I met her, she'd been timid and unsure, barely standing, now I've seen her sprint after puppies and play for hours.

Hattie was a perfect model, all she wanted to do was sit and lie down, happy to pose then let mme check photos on my computer before returning to her..

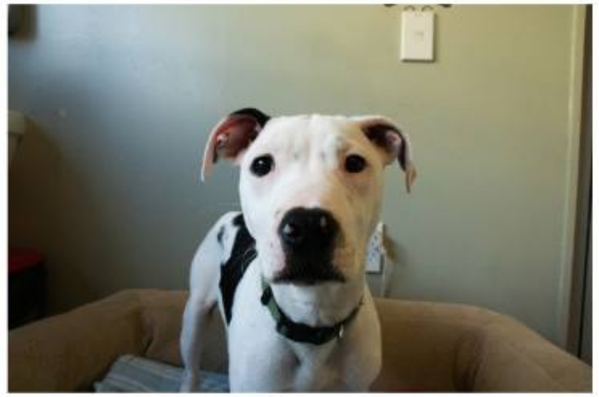

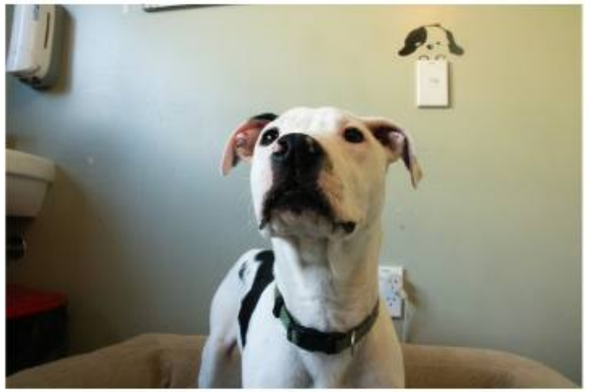

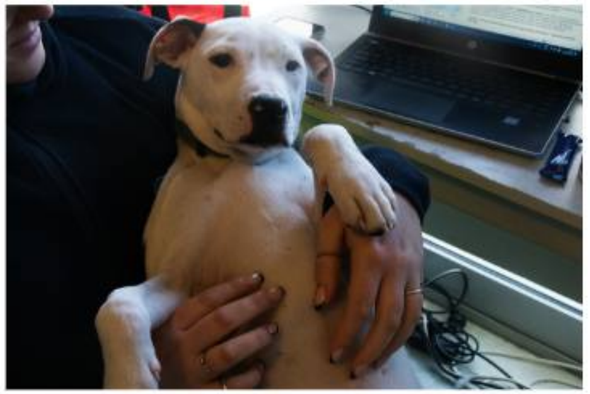

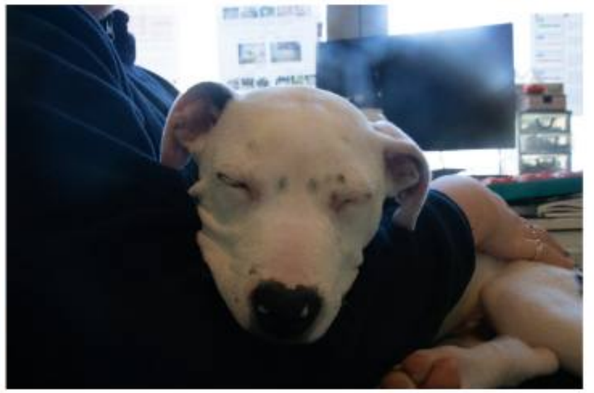

Pablo has his siblings were surrended to the SPCA.

Pablo was a wiggly bundle of joy to photograph, he was happy to venture through the toy box and discover what people had given, but ended up his happiest when he was given belly rubs and fell immediately to sleep, snoring very loudly.
